Day-1

Mr. Abhishek Singhaniya was saying that Financial freedom is different from being rich. Being rich means being able to buy expensive material possessions. Financial freedom is living the lifestyle you want without worrying about money. It means having enough passive income to cover your living expenses without necessarily needing to work. We can then work because we love it or not work because we choose not to. In an ever-evolving world driven by digital innovations and the rise of the gig economy, this concept of financial freedom has become increasingly significant. As the traditional paths of income and employment shift, the ability to create a reliable, independent source of ongoing income has become an essential aspect of modern life.

He said that Ultimately, achieving financial freedom is about having options, flexibility, and independence over how you spend your time. Financial freedom reduces money-related stress and allows you to live on your own terms. More free time and flexibility to pursue what you most love, including spending time with family, hobbies or interests that you want to pursue. Reduced stress from not having to worry about money. Ability to work because you want to, not because you have to. Financial security, even during recessions or job loss. Option to retire early or take mini-retirements. Financial independence to make choices based on your values, not a paycheck. Opportunity to give back and leave a legacy through philanthropy.

Day-2

Mr. Abhishek Singhaniya was saying that A money mindset is a prevailing attitude about finances and how you make, spend, and save money. It's a set of beliefs and behaviors that shape your financial habits and outcomes and are unique to you. Your money mindset is greatly influenced by your experiences and what you've learned about money growing up. For instance, if you grew up in a household where money was always tight, you might develop a scarcity mindset where you believe that there is never enough money. Or even if money wasn't so tight, you may have unconsciously taken on someone's prevailing belief of thoughts about money." A mindset of expansion, the belief that your abilities can be developed, is a key to financial freedom. This mindset will help you remain firmly on your pathway to financial freedom despite external circumstances when others get caught up in worry and limitation. Each challenge turns into an opportunity to grow, each apparent setback a lesson learned that propels you forward. The beauty of an expansion mindset is that anyone can achieve financial freedom by consistently applying key practical steps that lead us there steadily at first and then exponentially.

Day-3

Mr. Pankaj Mishra said that Fear often lurks in the background of financial decisions. Fears of loss, making a mistake, and financial instability can lead to paralyzing inaction or hasty decisions. Moving beyond these fears is crucial on the road to financial freedom. It begins by acknowledging your fears and understanding they are based on limiting thoughts that can be dispelled. Yes, we have to learn as we go and be wise with financial decisions, but fears (false evidence appearing real) are just based on our thoughts and don't need to stop us. Your life goals and financial goals should align and support each other. Start by identifying your long and short-term goals in different areas of your life, such as career, relationships, health, personal growth, and lifestyle. If you're still discovering what those goals look like for you, read our article about Getting Clarity & Finding Your Purpose. For many people, examples of short-term goals could include paying off credit card debt, going on a holiday, or saving for a down payment on a house. Long-term goals may include getting married, having children or upgrading your house.
